

I. READING

My name's Sophie. I live in Oxford, England. I'm fifteen years old.

I'm sure I'm not the only person my age who hates going to the dentist. Channel 4's late-night documentary 'Open wide' last Tuesday was excellent for people like me. However, none of my schoolmates watched it. They missed this opportunity to see something interesting and educational because the programme didn't appear in the 'TV Guide'. This was a pity, as it was the type of programme that makes both young people and their parents think about things they don't normally consider. Why can't television companies let us know about such important documentaries in advance?

The programme was important because it showed how methods of helping people with toothache have developed over the centuries. If you think visiting the dentist today is an uncomfortable experience, just be grateful you didn't live 200 years ago! Then, the programme told us, the only cure for toothache was removing the tooth. There weren't any dentists, so the person who cut your hair also pulled out your bad teeth, and there was nothing to stop you feeling the pain.

The programme has also completely change my attitude to looking after my teeth. My parents were always saying to me things like, 'Don't eat too many sweets,' and, 'Brush your teeth after meals,' but I never paid much attention. Now I've seen what damage sugar can do, especially if I don't use a toothbrush regularly, I'm going to change my habits. Many people would benefit from a repeat of this programme.
